is, if a Hiwassee City Water customer doesn't pay his or her sewer bill, the city can disconnect that accountholder's water service to encourage repayment of what's owed.

However, since the Water Authority is in charge of some water accounts of customers who also receive city sewer services, the city has been unable to get the Water Authority to allow it to use water cutoff as leverage to collect on past-due bills owed to the city, Ordiales said.

"We've had, for the last three years, a little bit of a disagreement, and we haven't been able to collect on several sewer accounts," Ordiales said.

Citing tight budgetary margins within the sewer department, Ordiales said it's imperative that the city be the sole water provider in instances where it also provides sewer so that it can cut water service to encourage customers to pay their unpaid utilities.

The city has roughly 160 accounts that are subject to the sewer/water split between the city and Water Authority, the majority of which Ordiales said pays its bills. But the customers who refuse to pay on their accounts have accrued more than $20,000 in total unpaid sewer bills.

"That's more than 10% of our total in the bank money for the sewer department," Ordiales said.

To make matters worse, the city lost even more sewer revenues recently after having to write off about $7,000 in related unpaid sewer bills upon switching to a new billing program, Ordiales said.

Being unable to collect on these past-due amounts is not only unfair to customers who manage to pay their bills, Ordiales said, but it also hurts the city's ability to maintain operations for everyone on the system, as regular upkeep is necessary.

And since the city has to keep each of its departments' finances separate, it's not like the city can just transfer reserve funds to the sewer, making the ability to enforce collections within the sewer department essential to the city, Ordiales said.

"Just today, I approved $6,780 worth of repairs and maintenance to the sewer department," Ordiales said. "It's an expensive proposition, and we just need to collect as much money as we can for that fund."

As such, the council voted unanimously in the Feb. 24 meeting to approve the moratorium on new sewer services in the county related to Water Authority accounts until such a time as the city can resolve its sewer service woes and figure out how to collect over $20,000 in unpaid bills.

The moratorium will not affect current accounts but will remain in place for new accounts as the city and Water Authority enter into a mediation process this week to discuss possible solutions, Ordiales said.

One such solution would be for the city to service all water accounts where it also provides sewer, while another potential solution would be for the Water Authority to begin cooperating with the city's efforts to collect on past-due sewer bills.

Comments from the Towns County Water Authority Board were not available at press time.

and Hiwassee's Fluoride Referendum.

As previously reported, concerning the SPLOST referendum, the county is calling for voters to decide on an estimated $12 million SPLOST to be instituted starting Oct. 1 to finance renovations and possibly an addition to the Towns County Courthouse, which dates to 1964.

Voter approval of the SPLOST, to be collected over six years, will also constitute approval of the issuance of a General Obligation Bond not to exceed $8 million to facilitate courthouse renovations and a possible addition.

The current Education-SPLOST, which makes up 1% of the 7% sales tax in Towns County, will expire on Sept. 30 this year, so the sales tax rate will simply remain the same at 7 cents on the dollar should voters approve the county's 1-cent SPLOST referendum on May 19.

Regarding the freeport exemption referendum, such an exemption would allow businesses to temporarily store certain goods and raw materials without being subject to property taxes on those goods and materials, at least for a time.

If passed, the freeport exemption would aid existing small manufacturing businesses in Towns County and help to attract new ones, Sole Commissioner Cliff Bradshaw said.

As for the fluoride referendum, Hiwassee is asking voters whether or not they want to add fluoride to the city drinking water supply that serves many people in Towns County.

A Nonpartisan General Election will run concurrently with the General Primary on May 19, and winners there will be sworn into office in 2020.

The voter registration deadline for the May 19 elections, during which the above three referendums and various candidates will be decided, will be April 20.
